When we think about it, thirty years ago having a television in the house was considered a luxury or some sort of high-society item. There were only two or three channels rather than hundreds when it came to number of channels. People had to obtain music and movies from stores on occasion, as well as VCRs or a television. People had to go out and buy music albums and movies on rare occasions. Over time, new televisions with more features have been developed, making previous versions more affordable for everyone. Today, even the tiniest home has at least one TV.

Laptops have replaced a slew of items, including televisions, VCRs, and DVDs. However, we may not walk around with laptops in our hands. If you want to watch your favorite show on a laptop, you'll have to visit numerous websites to look for it. When it comes to using a phone, things become much more difficult. We may watch programs on YouTube but episodes are sometimes added days after they've aired. Isn't it about time that someone built a program that functioned properly comparable to the television? It's correct if Yes is chosen. ThopTV is an app that enables users to watch their favorite TV shows at home just as they would in front of the television.
